As she did in The Return of Martin Guerre, Natalie Zemon Davis here retrieves three women's lives from historical obscurity to give us a window onto the early modern world. Glikl bas Judah Leib, Marie de l'Incarnation, and Maria Sibylla Merian were living 'on the margins' in seventeenth-century

Europe, North America, and South America.

Her bibliography is impressive. The three women she chooses to highlight are compelling historically relative figures in their own right even though women back then had limited opportunities.

These three women find a way to carve out an imporant roll in life and leave a legacy that is difficult to overlook. Kudos to the author for this book.

Women on the Margins examines the lives of three seventeenth-century

European women: Glikl bas Judah Leib, a Jewish wife and trader; Marie de l'Incarnation, a Catholic who left behind her community and her child in France in order to help found a convent in Canada; and Maria Sibylla Merian, a Protestant artist-naturalist who travelled to Suriname to study and paint insect life.

Most notable, according to Davis, were the unique lives these women created for themselves on the margins. I was not entirely satisfied with her definition of "living on the margins" - most individuals throughout history have lived "on the margins," away from centers of political power or formal centers of learning and cultural definition.

Rather, they were living "on the margins" in 17th-century Europe, North America and South America. Yet these women - one Jewish, one Catholic, one Protestant - left behind memoirs and writings that make for a spellbinding tale and that, in Davis' deft narrative, tell us more about the life of early modern Europe than many an official history.
